About suicide bombings

The recent rise in suicide bombings is likely in response to governments imposing increasingly stringent security measures. Suicide bombings have become one of the few remaining ways for terrorist organizations to effectively target their enemies, and are a way that such groups can fight against an enemy with conventional military superiority.

It is only a matter of time before suicide bombers attempt to target US sites. Emergency responders at all levels must learn to work together to deter suicide bombers from attacking sites in their towns, and to respond in the event that an attack does occur.

About the program

Suicide Bomber is designed to provide training and information to bomb squads, police, fire fighters, EMS, security, and military personnel likely to be on the scene of an attempted or actual suicide bombing. Emergency management, hospital emergency department personnel, dispatchers, and others who would support the front line response would also benefit from training with this program.

The program outlines trends in suicide terrorism, briefly studies some of the groups that may be associated with such bombings, and describes their motivations, goals and tactics. The most common bomb targets are identified. The program examines how different types of suicide bombs are constructed and concealed, both on a human body and in a vehicle, and offers clues to the presence of a human or vehicle bomb.

Suicide Bomber stresses the importance of intelligence gathering and cooperation. It describes the process that terrorists often go through to plan an attack and shows how improved security measures can defend a site before a bomber has the opportunity to carry out the plan.

The program portrays both pre-detonation and post detonation responses. It shows dispatchers taking warning calls, the mobilization of local responders, notification of federal agencies, and making the decision whether to evacuate civilians from the area. It also discusses the use of deadly force against a suspect, and what to do if the suspect appears to want to surrender.

For post detonation situations, the program depicts responders identifying WMD agents through monitoring and sampling, checking for secondary devices, triage, dealing with injured civilians, conducting search and rescue, and more.

Suicide Bomber was filmed in Ventura County, CA with the help of local emergency response organizations. An accompanying Leader's Guide includes seminar objectives, quizzes, ideas for classroom & ideas for exercises..
